ALBUQUERQUE – A federal grand jury sitting in Albuquerque, N.M., returned an indictment Aug. 15 charging Eli Frank Woody, 25, an enrolled member of the Navajo Nation who resides in Crownpoint, N.M., with federal assault and firearm charges arising out of a July 18 drive-by shooting that injured two Navajo children.

The three-count indictment charges Woody with two counts of assault resulting in serious bodily injury to a child, and discharging a firearm during a crime of violence.

According to the indictment, Woody assaulted and seriously injured two minor children on July 18 in McKinley County, N.M. The indictment also alleges that Woody used and discharged a firearm to assault the two minor victims, causing them to suffer serious bodily injury. Woody was arraigned on the indictment on Aug. 21, in federal court in Albuquerque.

Woody was arrested on July 24, on federal charges arising out of the July 18 incident, which were set forth in a criminal complaint that was filed on July 19. According to the criminal complaint, on July 18, Woody allegedly fired a shotgun from a vehicle, in which he was a passenger, into a residence, injuring two Navajo children who were inside the residence.

The residence was located in Crownpoint, which is located within the Navajo Indian Reservation. The complaint stated that the children were transported to a hospital for medical care and survived the shooting.
