the man in the white Ford truck was trying to leave the scene, and he kept putting his truck in reverse.

However, his truck's front end was severely damaged, so he was unable to leave.

After talking to the female victim, Strandy approached the white F-150 truck. He saw a Native American man, who was later identified as Largo in the driver seat.

When Strandy opened the truck's driver side door, he could smell alcohol coming from the vehicle and Largo himself. He leaned in to speak to Largo, who complained of chest pain. When Largo spoke, Strandy could smell alcohol on his breath.

Strandy also noticed an open 12 oz. can of Coors Light on the floor board by Largo's feet.

Largo stayed in the truck because Strandy was worried that he might have a chest injury. Next, he was transported to a local hospital by ambulance. Gallup Police Officer Ryan Boucher followed the ambulance, and conducted a DWI investigation at the hospital.

According to Strandy's report, Largo admitted he ran a red light at the intersection. He was traveling southbound on Highway 491 and ran the red light at Maloney Avenue.

The second driver involved in the crash told Strandy that she had been driving eastbound on Maloney Avenue, and she had been trying to make a left turn when Largo hit her car.

The fifth victim was waiting to turn left onto Maloney Avenue when she saw the collision happen. The second victim's car ended up hitting her car, which left damage to the driver's side door.

Although the front end of the fifth victim's car was damaged, she was able to drive away on her own, and she didn't have any injuries.

The final victim was stopped at the red light when the accident happened. The third victim's car made contact with the final victim's car, causing damage to the driver's side doors.
